The Best Times to Visit Port Douglas

Port Douglas is an amazing place to visit at any time of the year. The beautiful harbour town is one hour north of Cairns, so it is well within the tropics. For travellers that haven't visited the tropics before, Port Douglas is a wonderful base to explore: miles of tropical sandy beaches, access to the Great Barrier Reef and close to pristine tropical rainforest.

Being a tropical location, Port Douglas essentially has two seasons: The wet and dry season. The wet season is from November to April. During this time you can expect average temperatures to be around 30 degrees Celsius, with an average monthly rainfall of 375mm. March is generally the wettest month. However, this rainfall can be a welcome release for those travellers that don't like the weather too humid, and the rainforest, in particular, looks incredible during this season – teeming with life, and with the waterfalls in full flow.

The dry season is from May to October. Though cooler, temperatures are still warm with an average temperature between 20-25 degrees Celsius. There is far less rainfall during this season-some months as little as 25mm. In the sea, the water temperature will still be warm. The average temperature for June-August is a perfect 22 degrees Celsius.

Of course, some vacation activities are not weather dependent at all. Port Douglas is a luxury resort, and Macrossan Street, the main hub of the town, boasts a great variety of boutiques, restaurants, bars, galleries and designer shopping. At one end of the street is the picture-postcard beautiful Four Mile Beach, and at the other end is Anzac Park which hosts a wonderful local market every Sunday.

There isn't a time of year that would be unsuitable for a great vacation, but depending on your priorities, some months may be better than others.
